Death penalty or Capital punishment is a controversial and debatable topic for the developed nations such as the United States that heavily vouch for human rights and humanitarian spirits. The proponents of the death penalty argue that it is necessary to ensure social stability and security while the opponents believe that death penalty does not comply by the social and moral ethics. To argue on the basis of facts and statistics, several studies have been conducted to evaluate the efficiency of this argument.

In his study titled “End of its rope”, Garrett (2017) provides an opposing argument of death penalty. He believes that cancelling the death penalty can help in the revival of true spirit of criminal justice. American capital punishments have both declined and get moved in a little gathering of districts. As he would like to think 2014, court featured how from 2004 to 2006, "just 29 regions represented around half of all capital punishments forced across the country." That decay has gotten more emotional. In 2015, 51 respondents were sentenced to death in 38 provinces. In 2016, 31 litigants were sentenced to death in 28 provinces. During the 1990s, via contrast, more than three hundred individuals were sentenced to death in two hundred districts each year. While the authors have progressively remarked on this decay and hypothesized concerning what may be causing it, specialists have not analyzed it experimentally. Furthermore, this Article reports the consequences of measurable examination of information hand-gathered on all capital punishment, by area, for the whole current time of capital discipline since last couple of decades.

This examination of capital punishment information looks to respond to the inquiry why a couple of districts, yet not the greater part of the others, actually force capital punishments. The authors inspect state and county level changes in murder rates, populace, casualty rate, demography, and different characteristics that may clarify moving capital punishment designs. The authors find that capital punishments are firmly connected with metropolitan, thickly crowded provinces. The authors also find that death sentences are emphatically connected with regions that have enormous dark populaces. Also, the authors discover manslaughter rates are identified with death sentence - inside and between death sentence districts; inside and between death sentence provinces following a slack to represent the time it can take for a case to continue to a sentencing; and that regions with more white casualties of crime have more death sentence. Furthermore, the authors find that death sentence is related with dormancy or the quantity of earlier death sentences inside a province. These results suggest what gets by from the American capital punishment is fragile and mirrors a practice of racial inclination and peculiar close by tendencies. The creators wrap up by discussing the functional and legitimate consequences of these examples for the much-decreased capital punishment and for criminal equity even more completely.

Anderson et al. (2017) also conducted a study about the perceptions of the Americans regarding the death penalty. The authors emphasized that the comprehension of the two changes in general assessment on death penalty in the America and changes in the variables related with popular assessment on the capital punishment. Backing for the capital punishment might be propelled by occasions taking place during explicit time-frames, and it can shift across birth associates because of cohort-specific socialization measures, segment changes, and developmental occasions that are explicit to every age. An explanation of the wellsprings of and variety in capital punishment perspectives after some time would profit by the representing the age of the participants, the time of the review reaction, and the birth accomplice of the participant. The authors develop past research by utilizing numerous methodologies including various leveled age–period–companion models and information from the General Social Survey to inspect changes in capital punishment mentalities over the long run and across birth associates. The outcomes showed curvilinear age impacts, solid period impacts, and powerless accomplice consequences for capital punishment support. Also, the fierce crime rate clarified a significant part of the variety in help for the capital
